SMALL POX.

FIRST ARTICLE.

"Salutis populi suprema lex."

—Cicero, de Leibus.

The appearance of small-pox as a very recent and sister colony, Victoria, prompts me to regret a few marks on its history, progress, and mortality, in hope that the people of this colony will be induced to avail themselves of the prophylactic power of vaccination, and thereby oppose a most powerful barrier to the spread of this hideous disease, which a first-hand medical authority describes, as "a disease of a most contagious nature, and rapidly propagated, where it once obtains a footing, from one to another." That vaccination, generally speaking, is a preventive of small-pox, there can be no doubt; it is universally acknowledged as one of the greatest benefits that could have been conferred on mankind, by any single individual, and parents who have hitherto neglected to avail themselves of such advantages for their children, should lose no time in having recourse to that expedient which is proved to be the only certain means of insuring their lives against the dangers of, and their personal appearance from the frightful scars and deformities occasioned by this loathsome disease.

I may, however, in a future article take up the subject of vaccination; for I will confine my remarks to the history and progress of small-pox.

It is a question which in all probability will never be solved, in what age or in what country the small-pox originated; but no matter what curiosity may be attached to the knowledge of its origin, it is certainly not a matter of much importance to mankind, and we must content ourselves with the generally received opinion that the disease first made its appearance in the course of the sixteenth century.

The Arabians were the first to whom we are indebted for an account of the small-pox, more particularly to Rhazes, one of their first and best writers, and who flourished in the early part of the tenth century.

From the writings of Rhazes we learn that the small-pox was not then a new disorder, and he quotes from Ahron, the first author who professes to write on small-pox, and who lived in Alexandria during the time of the Crusades, that he had seen it in the writings of Ahron as lost, as they would, in all probability have thrown additional light on the history of this disease. There seems to be very little doubt that the disease called plague, a circumstance which the earliest authors with the small-pox, for every disease which proved fatal was called the plague, petit, laes, &c.; and there is every reason to suppose that the disease which proved fatal in the East, and which has been described by Theophrastus, as the plague, petit, laes, &c.; and there is every reason to suppose that the disease which proved fatal in the East, and which

written before the year 900, so that it is evident that the small-pox was not introduced to Europe by the Crusaders.

In the Cottonian manuscript, which was also written before 900, the term variola is often employed, a name which to this day is used to denote small-pox.

Whatever has been the doubt and uncertainty respecting the origin of this disease, all authors agree as to the dreadful mortality occasioned by the pestilence wherever and whenever it has appeared, and the great consternation it has occasioned to the inhabitants of the East and of the West. The records of the sixteenth century and the records of its devastation there are most painful to contemplate, and it is said that more than three millions and a half of people were destroyed in a few years in Mexico, after the infection had reached that kingdom. Baron Dimdale says "It is needless to expatriate on the havoc which the small-pox makes in most parts of the known world; probably there is not city, country, or smaller community which has not experienced its devastation in its town. The very idea of it is insupportable; but its real effects, in places unprepared and unacquainted with its proper treatment, and remedies against it, are not less general and fatal than the plague itself."

The prevalence and malignity of the small-pox has always made it a matter of much interest with authors, and it has been more than once the subject of a work. "I studied the disease with a closeness almost unparalleled," Boerhaave followed in his wake, and to him we are indebted for first putting forward the idea of contagion being the exciting cause of the disease. Small-pox is not an unavoidable disease—it is not natural to the human constitution. Though called the natural small-pox, it is a foreign contagion, the progress of which may be arrested by some few simple precautions, and many valuable lives thereby saved to the community.

Wherever it has appeared great numbers of mankind have been swept off by and these not the aged and infirm, but the young and robust, whose loss can be an object of the greatest consideration to the public. Whatever then can have the effect of rescuing human beings from the fatal and sure, and which would otherwise most probably and surely fall victims to this distemper, must certainly excite no common interest, but claim the attention of every community, who ought to employ, may insist on every means which may be employed to prevent the spread of such an epidemic.

It was a long time after small-pox was known, and studied by medical men, that any idea prevailed that it was a contagious disease, and that it was a virulence, as it was called, and that it was a virulence, as it was called, and that it was a

virulence, as it was called, and that it was a

REVIEW.

[illegible][illegible][illegible]

"The funds in our hands for emigration to New South Wales on last January, 1866, amounted to £56,000. In January and March we received $15,923 10s. 6d., and the balance of remittance of £100,000, and in April and May they reached us further remittances amounting to £28,381 8s. 6d. We also received in the course of the year additional sums, amounting to about £7000, principally on account of the emigration of persons from America, Canada, &c., and a gross total of about £116,000. We also received in the month of April, 1866, a notification that a further sum of £100,000 had been voted for emigration purposes by the colonial Government; but it was not until the close of the year that the said sum actually reached our count of this amount reached our hands. These sums enabled us, as will have been seen, to send 26 ships to New South Wales in the course of 1866, being at the rate of eight or nine months' voyage, and three ships, the Nimrod, which sailed on the 1st July, had on board a company of the Royal Artillery, sent out by Government to take charge of the batteries constructed by the colonial Government, at the expense of the colony, for the protection of the new settlements.

"While advertising to the emigration conducted by this board, we must point out that, so far as regards the colony of Victoria, our operations in regard to the selection of immigrants will very shortly come to an end. The Government of Victoria now joins that the Land Fund has been surrendered to them, have considered very naturally that it would be more appropriate to employ the money appropriated to emigration to be disbursed by officers responsible to themselves, instead of by officers responsible only to her Majesty's Government in this country. They have accordingly given notice to terminate on the 1st July next their operations to the colony, and may next give satisfaction to you as to be able to quote the terms, in which, while announcing the proposed change, the colonial Government have noticed our past services."

NIAGARA FALLS.—From the "Own Correspondent" of the New York Tribune.—Niagara Falls, June 1, 1867. You and I are altogether too old stagers to expect much to go into rhapsodies of admiration, to write verses, or to do anything else, in honor of Niagara. We have seen the thing tried many and many a time, and as often have witnessed ignominious failures. Indeed, more than once we have had to bear the burden of those failures ourselves, for when some unfledged correspondent, upon his maiden flight, stopped here, chanted verses, and extempered them both melodiously and sublime, and fully equal to the best of the poets, your columns, my dear old Traveller, have had to print such stuff as dreams are made of, and the world should wink its eye and whisper of dotage. Well, you have renewed your youth, but have joined to its vivacity and power the maddest determination to do all that is decent, to no more danger of anything of the kind. We may express sage reflections from you in the manner of the poem that ends—

Labourer of labour in ocean rolls arise; but nothing like this which follows will ever again disfigure your fair proportions:

O Great Cataract, I feel As awful as last night's Wat an Main sin of mid-privileges mite To me, if I am not to mind To. There ain't no water-care in our Glorious country that begins to be So different from yore, yea, what a A-ful in all the time O'rate Cateact, I wish to see the great world already,
Faring you keep thumblin' To everlasting. Thun! I sweet an You, the spirit you're in, what Island. How'd you feel there. What you go at
To the bottom of the world?
O what a fall were their countrymen,
I feel as if I hadn't got much more to say!
I feel as if I hadn't got much more to say!
Yours hard-shell Baptist, you are,—
I wish to see the great world already,
Faring you keep thumblin'
You shamed. Thun! Sunday. Praps you think There's in church. Dry up your Gtateact.
Don't afraid. You're a good man.
You can get much carter soon. You get Oinks to me to ride to them when I wot That means. My phony went sore.
This mornin'. I kepe thinking of the 50 cts Just me to ride to them when I wot Just as well waikid. Good bye. But you Are so so. When you Get tired, dry up, Gtateact.
